Illegitimate use of scientific results to support a specific viewpoint, especially when the use of the results goes beyond the limits of the original scientific context, is called misuse of science. Misuse of science can be intentional or unintentional. Unintentional misuse of science occurs when the results of a study are used in a way that is not consistent with the original intent of the study. For example, a study that shows that a certain drug is effective for treating a specific condition might be misused to claim that the drug is effective for treating all conditions. Intentional misuse of science occurs when the results of a study are used to support a specific viewpoint, even if the results do not actually support that viewpoint. For example, a study that shows that a certain drug is effective for treating a specific condition might be misused to claim that the drug is effective for treating all conditions, even if the results do not actually support that claim.

These results suggest that the use of a single, non-validated, questionnaire to assess the prevalence of the disease may be a useful tool for the identification of the disease in the community. The results of this study suggest that the prevalence of the disease is higher in the community than in the hospital. This may be due to the fact that the community is a more diverse population and may have a higher prevalence of the disease.
