By the early 1990s, however, it was clear that the economic benefits of trade and globalization, though real, had been unevenly shared. There had been problems, notably the difficulties faced by the African continent, but also a growing sense that the opening to the outside world, even if it was being achieved, was not necessarily a panacea for all economic ills. Hence the process of the opening of economies, particularly in the developing world, has been difficult and has not always brought the results that were hoped for. The fact remains that the world has opened up and the process is continuing, but the problems of the developing regions are still a focus of attention of the World Trade Organization and other international bodies. The process of trade liberalization is not a simple one and it is not a magic wand that will solve all economic problems.
