

The Excretory System

Read the passage below and then answer the questions to complete sentences.

The excretory system is responsible for removing waste products from the body. The major organs involved in this system are the kidneys, liver, lungs, skin, and intestines. Each organ plays a crucial role in filtering waste products, maintaining fluid balance, and regulating blood pressure.

The kidneys are responsible for filtering blood and removing waste products like urea and excess fluids. The liver is responsible for breaking down toxic substances and producing bile, which helps in digestion. The lungs remove carbon dioxide, a waste product of respiration, while the skin excretes sweat, which helps regulate body temperature and remove excess salt.

The intestines remove solid waste products from the body through the process of defecation. The excretory system also plays a role in regulating the body's fluid balance by controlling the amount of water and salt that is excreted from the body.

Overall, the excretory system is a vital part of the body's overall function. Without it, waste products would build
