Open Web Application Security Project (OWASP)

The Open Web Application Security Project (OWASP) is a not-for-profit organization dedicated to improving the security of software and applications online. OWASP was founded in 2001, and its mission is to provide free, open-source tools and resources to help developers and organizations create more secure applications and services. OWASP promotes awareness of web application security issues, develops resources to educate developers and users, and offers various testing tools to help organizations identify and fix security vulnerabilities. OWASP's resources are used by developers, security professionals, and organizations worldwide to build and maintain secure applications.

OWASP's commitment to open-source software and information sharing has made it an invaluable resource for the security community.

OWASP's mission is to raise awareness of the risks of building insecure software. The goals of OWASP are to do the following:

- Create awareness of risks and vulnerabilities in software applications.
- Create and promote tools and resources for developers to create more secure applications.
- Provide a forum for individuals to contribute and collaborate on security initiatives through open-source software.

OWASP's resources include free web application security tools, training, and other resources designed to help organizations identify and fix application security vulnerabilities. OWASP's community-driven approach to software security provides organizations with various resources, including software tools, guides, training, and research. These resources help organizations improve software security, prioritize and plan security initiatives, and meet compliance standards. OWASP's commitment to open-source software and information sharing has made it an invaluable resource for the security community. OWASP's resources are free, easy to use, and available to everyone, making them an ideal solution for organizations of all sizes and industries.
