Abstract: This article is a critical analysis of the work of the American Psychological Association (APA) and the American Psychiatric Association (APA) in the area of mental health. The author argues that the APA and APA have been instrumental in the development of a mental health system that is based on a medical model of mental illness. This model views mental illness as a disease that can be treated with medication and therapy. The author argues that this model is flawed and that a more holistic approach to mental health is needed. The author also discusses the role of the APA and APA in the development of the DSM-5 and the impact of this manual on the mental health system. The author concludes by arguing that the APA and APA should be held accountable for their role in the development of the mental health system and that a more holistic approach to mental health is needed.
