Abstract: The authors used a qualitative approach to explore the experiences of African American women who are mothers of children with emotional and behavioral problems. The women were interviewed about their experiences with their children's behavior problems, the impact of these problems on their lives, and the support they received from family and community. The findings suggest that the women experienced a range of challenges, including difficulties with their children's behavior, problems with school, and difficulties with family and community support. The women also reported a range of coping strategies, including seeking support from family and community, and using self-help strategies. The findings have implications for the development of interventions to support African American women who are mothers of children with emotional and behavioral problems.
