

Writing a ‘Short Communication’

Ali Madeeh Hashmi

INTRODUCTION

There is no definition of short communications according to the International Committee of Medical Journal Editors (ICMJE).¹ However, it is generally understood that a short (or brief) communication is a concise, independent report representing a significant contribution to science. Sometimes, the term ‘Short Communication’ is confused or used interchangeably with ‘Special or Rapid Communication’ although the two terms differ as explained below. Short communications are generally not intended to publish preliminary results of an ongoing or recently concluded study unless the results are of exceptional interest and particular relevance. In general, the length of a short communication is restricted to 2500 words (some journals may allow up to 3500 words). It may include two figures or tables, and should have at least 8 references. Unlike a full length paper, ‘Methods’, ‘Results’ and ‘Discussion’ may be combined into a single section in a Short Communication.² Not all journals accept short communications so authors need to check before submission whether their intended journal will accept their submission.

‘Rapid communications’³ are similar to ‘short communications’. These are usually articles used to disseminate preliminary results that are original, of high interest and likely to have a significant impact on the relevant scientific community. In the healthcare field, this can include information that is urgent from a public health perspective or findings in a rapidly changing specialty (e.g. Infectious Disease). Their format is
