Therapeutic drug monitoring (TDM) is the measurement of drug concentrations in the blood to optimize the efficacy and safety of drug therapy. TDM is most useful for drugs with a narrow therapeutic index, where the difference between a therapeutic and a toxic concentration is small. TDM is also useful for drugs with a long half-life, where the concentration of the drug in the blood is expected to be relatively stable over time. TDM is also useful for drugs with a high degree of inter-individual variability, where the concentration of the drug in the blood may vary significantly between individuals. TDM is typically performed using blood samples, and the results are used to adjust the dose of the drug to achieve the desired therapeutic effect.
