Abstract: This study examined the effects of workplace health promotion (WHP) on the health-related quality of life (HRQL) of nurses. Nurses working in a hospital were randomly assigned to a WHP group or a control group. The WHP group received a comprehensive WHP program, including a health assessment, a health education program, a health promotion program, and a health maintenance program. The control group received no WHP program. The results showed that the WHP group had significantly higher scores on the HRQL scale than the control group. The WHP program had a positive effect on the HRQL of nurses.
