A weekly record of scientific progress Lean Engineering Education Shannon Flumerfelt, Franz-Josef Kahlen, 2015-06-09
Recent studies by professional organizations devoted to engineering education such as Vision 2030 ASME and Vision 2025 ASCE highlight the need for the restructuring of engineering education Deficiencies of many engineering graduates include poor systems thinking and systems analysis skills lack of sensitivity for sustainability issues poorly developed problem solving skills and lack of training to work in multi disciplinary teams as well as a lack of leadership entrepreneurship innovation and project management skills The book's contents include an analysis of current shortfalls in engineering education and education related to professional practice in engineering Further the authors describe desirable improvements as well as advocacy for the use of lean tenets and tools to create a new future for engineering education This book presents for the first time an outside in lean engineering perspective of how this commonly accepted and widely practiced and adapted engineering perspective can shape the direction in which the engineers of the future are trained and educated By its very nature lean engineering demands systems thinking and systems analysis as well as problem solving skills In this sense Lean Engineering immediately talks to sustainability of operations Hence this book adds to the body of knowledge regarding engineering education It blends the perspectives and expertise of mechanical industrial and production engineers and academics and the perspective from social sciences on the challenges encountered in engineering education Because of the unique mix of authors the book presents a well rounded perspective of how lean thinking can address shortcomings in engineering education A Self-appraisal of the Department of Chemical Engineering Pennsylvania State University.
