It seems as though communication with group members about the context and sharing of information, including social structure, will almost automatically lead to group cohesion, just as social structure will give processes insight into an area that otherwise goes unexamined. The epistemological point is not that communication further groups, and gives focus and order to the communication itself, but that the communication itself gives rise to the communication.

These studies will be of great interest (including to teachers). They provide useful and interesting insights into the nature of the relationship between the two components of the construct. I have enjoyed reading them.
