Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of convection within the mantle will also decrease. This could be the immediate reason there is no global magnetic field on Venus, but even if the mantle is convecting, the planet's slow rotation (one day more than 58 times longer than the orbital period of the Earth) cannot sustain a dynamo, a process that is essential to the formation of the magnetic field. The two problems on the side with increased risk are atmospheric erosion and the loss of water. The loss of water is a particularly important issue for the future of life on Venus. The atmosphere is composed of carbon dioxide, which is a greenhouse gas, and the loss of water would lead to a runaway greenhouse effect, making the planet even more inhospitable to life.
