Abstract Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported depression and anxiety among the general population of the United States. Methods: Data were obtained from the 2002 National Health and Medical Examination Survey, a nationally representative survey of the civilian, noninstitutionalized population of the United States. Results: The prevalence of self-reported depression was 10.1% and the prevalence of self-reported anxiety was 11.1%. The prevalence of self-reported depression and anxiety was higher among females than males, and higher among those with lower education and income. Conclusions: The prevalence of self-reported depression and anxiety is high among the general population of the United States. The prevalence of self-reported depression and anxiety is higher among females than males, and higher among those with lower education and income.
