Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion decreases and the particles "clump" together. The clumps are formed because the particles are moving more slowly and are therefore more likely to be captured by the attractive forces of the other particles. As the temperature decreases, the clumps grow larger and more numerous. At a certain point, the clumps become so large and so numerous that they fill the entire container. This is the state of the gas at low temperature and low pressure. The gas has become a liquid.
