These role-models proved to the younger girls that external beauty is not everything, and that internal beauty would benefit them greatly in many aspects of their futures. As the competitions have grown, the pageants have become more intense with contestants willing to do anything in order to gain advantage over the other girls. With everyone intensifying themselves, it creates a more stressful environment that can severely damage a girl's developing self-esteem. I think this topic is interesting and also sad.

With girls only having a few short years to feel completely confident with themselves before society begins to criticize them, believe that this time of placement is essential in developing a strong and confident teenager. Beauty pageants seem to be stripping girls of their innocence too fast, which leaves these girls at a risk for psychological and physical abuse that will stay with them for years to come. These girls have unrealistic expectations to be thin, physically beautiful, and perfect.

In one article that I read, it talked about how research has been conducted to see if former pageant participants are more likely to suffer from eating disorders, and a small study published in 2005 showed that former childhood pageant girls did have higher rates of body dissatisfaction, which factored into eating disorders. Take a look at the show Toddlers and Tiaras. Tears, tantrums, and fits are frequently shown on these shows, and of course instead of supporting or comforting their daughters the adults are mocking all of the crying children.

As a result, child contestants may believe that internal beauty comes from how perfectly they look or how well they perform on stage. Parents and other adults need to understand the potentially long-term impact super-competitive, beauty-inspired pursuits can have on a young girl's psyche. Participation in activities that seek superior physical appearance releases the idea that physical beauty and superficial charm are the keys to success, thus making self-worth and self-esteem tied to attractiveness.

The take home message for society is that natural beauty or brains aren't enough to make it in the real world, and that the only way to be on top is to be prettier than the girl next to you. Alumna discusses the negative effects of beauty pageants in her article, "Beauty Pageant Winners Are Not Good Role Models." She states that beauty pageants can influence a growing girl's body image and self-worth, and proves her assertion by talking about a small study that was done in 2005 that showed pageants contestants had higher rates of body dissatisfaction.

She goes on to talk about how the young women she has worked with to get over their eating disorders were all trained at a young age to value physical perfection, thinness, athletic prowess, and attractiveness. Her last valuable point is
