

The Locus and Focus of Public Administration Research in Tanzania: An Assessment of the Journal of Public Sector Management, 2011-2016

Ramadhani Marijani

Tanzania Public Service College, Tabora, Tanzania

This paper presents the locus and focus of public administration research in Tanzania through an assessment of articles published in the Journal of Public Sector Management (JPSM) from 2011 to 2016. A content analysis of 31 articles, guided by the research topic variable and comparative analysis of the categories of unit standards for public administration and management and the "Practices for Effective Local Government" developed by the International City/County Management Association (ICMA) was invoked. The findings indicate the heavy slant (96.62%) towards practice-oriented research at the expense of theory development. Apart from providing reasons for this slant, it is recommended in this paper that editors and authors of JPSM should include topics and themes that focus on theory and research so as to restore the erstwhile glory of public administration intellectual predominance and its foundations.

Keywords: public administration, research, theory, public sector

In recent years, Tanzanians' scientist spurring in the field of scientific publication is recommendable. The use of publications in academic promotions and appointments as criterion has brought about an avalanche of publications (Unal, Metin, & Veysel, 2012, p. 1) and academia has become an environment where researchers are succumbed into publish-or-perish entrepreneurs, to the extent of foregoing the clarion call of higher ideals of the pursuit of knowledge (Rekdal, 2014, p. 638). If this trend is left unabated, it will create a fertile environment for conception of "academic corner-cutting pregnancies" which will give birth to the "academic urban legends" who are in the dire need for academic positions and therefore to them number of publications is more important than the rigor (Rekdal, 2014, p. 638).

It is in the above context that Wessels (2005, p. 1499) reminded us of the urge to establish the practical usefulness of public administration discipline to the public sector. This is because the public sector is a key component of the economy, and it plays a critical role in economic growth and development in a country (Fourie & Wayne, 2017, p. 170). Therefore, in order to deliver better services, governments need to meet many challenges, both simple and complex; as a result, new problems arise and it is difficult for public officials to solve them alone. Public administration researchers must therefore offer a helping hand by producing the knowledge that will solve these complex public sector problems without jeopardizing its ability to survive as an academic discipline and scholarly community (Van der Waldt, 2013, p. 49; Wessels, 2005, p. 1500).
