ABSTRACT

Purchasing and supply management scholarship and practice has significantly evolved during the past 25 years. In parallel, the Journal of Purchasing and Supply Management has likewise emerged from its origins as the European Journal of Purchasing & Supply Management as an important source for publishing purchasing and supply management research. The purpose of this manuscript is to provide the journal's current and future readership a historical perspective of how the journal has evolved during the last quarter century from the viewpoints of its current and former editors, and where we believe the future of purchasing and supply management is going as an academic discipline.

1. Introduction

The 25th Anniversary Issue of the Journal of Purchasing and Supply Management (JPSM) marks a special time in this journal's history and development. To help commemorate this event, we thought it would be an opportune time to reflect on the journal's history and possible directions of its further evolution. The purpose of this manuscript is to provide the journal's current and future readership a historical perspective of how the journal has evolved during the last quarter century from the experiences of its current and former editors, and where we believe the future of purchasing and supply management is going as an academic discipline (see Fig. 1).

To accomplish this purpose, all prior and current JPSM editors have provided their perspectives and views of their experiences with the journal and the field of purchasing and supply management. In the following sections, each of the editors has provided a chronology of their tenure as editor, the strategy they pursued in leading the journal, and their view of the future of the field.

2. Editor perspectives

2.1. Richard Lamming, editor (1994–2001)

2.1.1. Chronology and strategy

During the 1980s, interest in formulating a new conceptual basis for understanding the economic activity in purchasing and supply management (PSM) was growing in Western business circles. This interest was born of twin stimuli: the need for improved, better informed, professional understanding and behaviour, and the limitations of traditional economic theories to explain or challenge relevant developments in practice. In North America, the National Association of Purchasing Managers (NAPM) had already developed an academic arm, characterized by business-university links; research centres; dedicated professors; and an academic journal, International Journal of Purchasing and Materials Management. NAPM's principal focus was on professional PSM training underpinned by applied research.

By the end of the decade, the professional organisations (institutes) with which those in PSM were affiliated in Europe had developed similar interests, especially in the Netherlands, where NEVI had
