

Chapter 3 Guide

Key Takeaways

Health information technology (HIT) is a broad category of electronic medical records, medical imaging, telemedicine, and mobile health systems that support clinical decision making, patient safety, and operational efficiency. HIT can also support administrative processes such as claims processing, financial management, and quality improvement. HIT can also support research, education, and training. HIT can also support public health activities such as disease surveillance and outbreak detection. It is important to remember that HIT is just one component of a larger healthcare system and must be used in conjunction with other healthcare professionals to provide safe, effective, and efficient care.

- The most common use of HIT is to support clinical decision making. This includes using electronic medical records (EMRs), electronic health records (EHRs), and mobile health systems to support healthcare delivery and administrative functions.
 - Clinical decision support (CDS) is a type of HIT that uses computerized systems to help healthcare providers make informed decisions about patient care. CDS can include automated reminders, clinical guidelines, and decision support tools.
 - Electronic medical records (EMRs) and electronic health records (EHRs) are two types of HIT that store and manage patient health information. EMRs are typically used by healthcare providers, while EHRs are used by both providers and patients.
 - Mobile health systems (mHealth) are another type of HIT that uses mobile devices like smartphones and tablets to support healthcare delivery. mHealth can include apps for tracking health data, remote monitoring, and telemedicine.
- HIT can also support administrative functions such as claims processing, financial management, and quality improvement. These functions involve managing patient data, billing, and insurance claims, as well as tracking performance metrics and identifying areas for improvement.
- HIT can also support research, education, and training. This includes using HIT to collect and analyze data for research purposes, develop educational materials, and train healthcare providers in new technologies and best practices.
- HIT can also support public health activities such as disease surveillance and outbreak detection. This involves using HIT to monitor and track the spread of diseases, identify trends, and inform public health policies.
