Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The intervention group (n = 15) participated in a 12-week walking program, while the control group (n = 15) remained sedentary. The walking program was designed to be low-intensity and supervised. The program consisted of three walking sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The walking speed was set at 1.5 miles per hour. The program was supervised by a certified walking instructor. The control group remained sedentary throughout the study. The study was conducted in a community setting. The participants were recruited from a local newspaper advertisement. The study was approved by the Institutional Review Board of the University of Illinois at Chicago. The data were collected using a questionnaire and a physical activity log. The questionnaire was administered at baseline and at the end of the 12-week program. The physical activity log was completed by the participants at the end of each walking session. The data were analyzed using a t-test. The results of the study showed that the walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the participants. The participants in the walking program showed a significant increase in physical activity, a significant decrease in body mass index, and a significant decrease in anxiety and depression. The participants in the control group showed no significant change in physical activity, body mass index, anxiety, or depression. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
