Abstract. The authors present a new method for the analysis of the dynamic behavior of a nonlinear system. The method is based on the use of a nonlinear normal mode (NNM) approach. The NNM is a single-degree-of-freedom system that captures the essential nonlinear dynamics of the original system. The NNM is used to reduce the dimensionality of the system, and the resulting reduced-order model is used to analyze the system's dynamic behavior. The method is applied to a nonlinear system with a single degree of freedom, and the results are compared with those obtained from a full-order model. The results show that the NNM approach provides a good approximation of the system's dynamic behavior, and it is able to capture the essential nonlinear dynamics of the system.

Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week, 30-min, 3 times per week, low-impact aerobically and resistance training program on the physical fitness of sedentary, middle-aged women. The subjects were 20 women, 40 to 50 years of age, who were sedentary and had no history of cardiovascular disease, hypertension, or other medical conditions. The subjects were randomly assigned to either a control group or an exercise group. The exercise group performed a low-impact aerobically and resistance training program for 10 weeks. The control group did not exercise. The subjects were tested at baseline and at 10 weeks for heart rate, blood pressure, and body composition. The exercise group showed significant improvements in heart rate, blood pressure, and body composition compared to the control group. The results of this study suggest that a low-impact aerobically and resistance training program can improve the physical fitness of sedentary, middle-aged women.
