Shrimp (genus Stomatopoda) are characterized by their large, segmented bodies, which are typically divided into three main regions: the head, the thorax, and the abdomen. The head is the most prominent part, featuring large, powerful eyes and a pair of antennae. The thorax is the middle section, which houses the heart and the digestive system. The abdomen is the longest part, ending in a pair of large, pincers called claws. Shrimp are found in a variety of aquatic environments, including oceans, rivers, and lakes. They are important in many ecosystems, serving as both predators and prey.
