Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion slowly decreases. Molecules that are bonded remain close to the other bonded particles, leaving the unbonded molecules at the front of the line and they move from the leading to the trailing end of the line. The former unbonded molecules are particles that are free-moving and follow the pattern of the leading or primary subpopulation of the gas. The latter particles are the ones who remain and are stationary, which means they are particles that are bonded to the molecules. The former are the particles that are free to move, the latter are the particles that are bonded to the molecules and are stationary. The former are the particles that are free to move, the latter are the particles that are bonded to the molecules and are stationary.
