

History of Newspapers

Newspapers have been an efficient and effective way to transfer news from one place to another. A variety of papers have existed since the first early civilizations and have continued to evolve over the centuries to the newspapers that we know today. Follow this timeline to see the journey of newspaper development throughout history.

The printing press was invented in the 15th and helped to expedite the dissemination of new thoughts and ideas. The printing press allowed for text to be moved and rearranged the process of printing multiple newspapers.

In the 16th century in England began to print treatises, just pamphlets, ballads, stories, and satirical pieces in the streets and taverns. They also became the first papers to print headwords and tables, covering occasional events and crises.

1640

In 1687 the first newspaper published in the United States, the first English newspaper that no one could be prosecuted for criticizing the government or violating the law.

1783

The first daily newspaper in America was published in 1783 and called the Pennsylvania Evening Post. 1 year later after 17 months, however it stopped and first daily newspaper returned. By 1801 there were just nearly daily newspapers around the country.

1843

The creation of the telegraph led to the creation of the first newspaper chain. The first newspaper chain was the first newspaper chain to be used national and across many international countries.
