

RESEARCHER: MICHIGAN STATE. Studies on 2700 patients show that individuals with an increased tendency to "overreact" to stressors have a 50% greater chance of developing coronary artery disease. The researchers believe that the stress response is a biological mechanism that evolved to protect the body from physical threats. However, in modern society, stressors are often psychological and chronic, leading to a prolonged state of "fight or flight" that can damage the heart and blood vessels. The researchers suggest that individuals with a heightened stress response should be monitored closely for signs of heart disease and encouraged to adopt stress-management techniques.
