The rotor is driven by the cam, which is in turn driven by the engine. The contact point is connected to the ignition coil. The rotor is connected to the spark plugs.

The distributor is shown in four different positions, illustrating the sequence of events during the ignition cycle. In each position, the rotor is in a different position, and the cam is also in a different position. The contact point is either closed or open, and the spark plug is either firing or not firing.

The distributor is a critical component of the ignition system, and it must be properly adjusted to ensure proper timing and spark distribution. If the distributor is not properly adjusted, the engine may run poorly, and the spark plugs may wear prematurely.
