Products from Marine Microorganisms Xian-Wen Yang, Bin-Gui Wang, Peter Proksch, 2020-01-22 Natural products continue to serve as sources for the development of new medicines There is currently a revival of interest in the discovery of bioactive compounds with new chemical structures from natural sources largely due to the fact that synthetic libraries have not yielded the expected number of developmental candidates in the pharmaceutical industry during the last decade. In addition, the emergence of clinically relevant pathogens that are becoming increasingly resistant to currently used medicines strengthens the notion that natural product research is urgently required. Considering the fact that almost 10% of bioactive compounds are of microbial origin and that marine microorganisms are relatively poorly studied compared to their terrestrial relatives, marine microorganisms are regarded as the most potential laden resource for drug discovery.
