Abstract Background: The use of mobile health (mHealth) technologies to improve health care delivery and patient health outcomes is growing rapidly. However, the use of mHealth technologies is often limited by a lack of evidence on their effectiveness and safety. Objective: The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness and safety of mHealth technologies for improving health care delivery and patient health outcomes. Methods: A systematic review of the literature was conducted to identify studies that evaluated the effectiveness and safety of mHealth technologies. The review included studies published between 2000 and 2015. The studies were evaluated based on their methodological quality and the strength of the evidence. Results: The review identified 10 studies that met the inclusion criteria. The studies evaluated the effectiveness and safety of mHealth technologies for improving health care delivery and patient health outcomes. The results of the review suggest that mHealth technologies can be effective and safe for improving health care delivery and patient health outcomes. Conclusions: The use of mHealth technologies can be effective and safe for improving health care delivery and patient health outcomes. However, more research is needed to evaluate the effectiveness and safety of mHealth technologies for specific health conditions and populations.
