Engineering Design Guide

Activity 1 Design a Composting System

In this activity, you will design, build, and test a model for a composting system.

BACKGROUND

The billions of microorganisms found in soil are the world's most experienced experts at recycling. You may know of this process in nature as decomposition, decay, or rot. Microorganisms break down organic matter—once-living plants and animals, animal wastes, and dead leaves—to produce nutrients. The microorganisms use the nutrients to provide the energy and raw materials they need for growth, development, and other life functions. Most microorganisms need oxygen to perform processes such as cellular respiration, but some can get energy from less-efficient processes in the absence of oxygen.

The decomposition of organic matter occurs in nature, but what happens to the organic matter that results from human use? Most of it, such as grass clippings and other yard wastes, and kitchen scraps like banana peels and apple cores, ends up in landfills. These materials eventually decay, but it's a slow and inefficient process because there's not much oxygen or moisture in a landfill. As landfills fill up, more of them are needed to hold all our waste. There's a solution to this land-pollution problem that won't have such a large negative impact on the environment. It's called composting.

Materials

Use materials that your teacher provides or those of your choice.

SAFETY

- Wear safety goggles, gloves, and an apron at all times.
- Handle sharp objects such as knives, scissors, and nails carefully.

DESIGN CHALLENGE

Objective: Design, build, and test a small-scale composting system that successfully supports an aerobic, heat-producing composting process.

Composting is a technology in which organic wastes are decomposed naturally under oxygen-rich conditions. Composting reduces the amount of waste sent to landfills and produces a natural fertilizer that can be used to enrich garden soil. You may be familiar with large outdoor composting systems that can recycle large quantities of food and yard wastes. However, you can also do composting on a small scale in your classroom using a variety of small containers. Your team's challenge is to design, build, and test a small model that successfully composts organic material.
