

SAVAGE MODEL 1919 NRA TARGET RIFLE

By DENNIS KORDAN

Bolt-action rifles were not very popular in the U.S. until World War I when a large number of soldiers used M1903 Springfield and M1917 Enfield Service rifles and acquired a liking for this type of rifle. Following the war, U.S. rifle manufacturers have shown several models of commercial bolt-action rifles to meet popular demand. One of these rifles, the Savage Model 1919 NRA, was of military style with a long forestock. NRA in the rifle's name was explained by Savage firearms' desire to ensure that the rifle was suitable for firing from various mounted positions incorporated in National Rifle Association members.

This target rifle was offered in 2 chamberings, .22 long rifle and .22 short. The rifle chambered for .22 short was made on special order to save the load economy and is thus rare.

In both chamberings, the rifle had a 27" round barrel and weighed approximately 7 lbs. The 3-piece bolt had a magazine front part and the bolt handle on the rear portion served as a locking lug. A bolted head on the locking piece prevented manual locking without opening the bolt.

Cartridges were fed from a forward detachable box magazine with a bolted head on the bottom to facilitate loading. The magazine-mounted safety was on the right of the action behind the bolt handle. An aperture rear sight with screw adjustments for windage and elevation was mounted on the upper rear of the action, and the front sight was described near the barrel.

An integral feature was that the barrel and receiver were integral. Non-adjustable was the 2-piece action. The cartridge was made in 2 portions to aid in bolt opening.

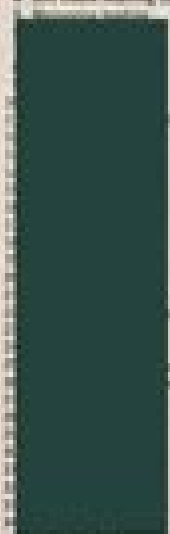

For one-piece design, the reinforced walnut stock with pistol grip was fitted with a steel forestock. Also provided were 1 1/2" sling swivels, 2 rubber-wood butt stocks, and grouping pinion in the forestock.

A later version or style of this rifle with serial numbers ranging from 25000 to 45000 had a single-piece action, improvements, and several other action modifications. The original and later versions were essentially alike in external appearance, however.

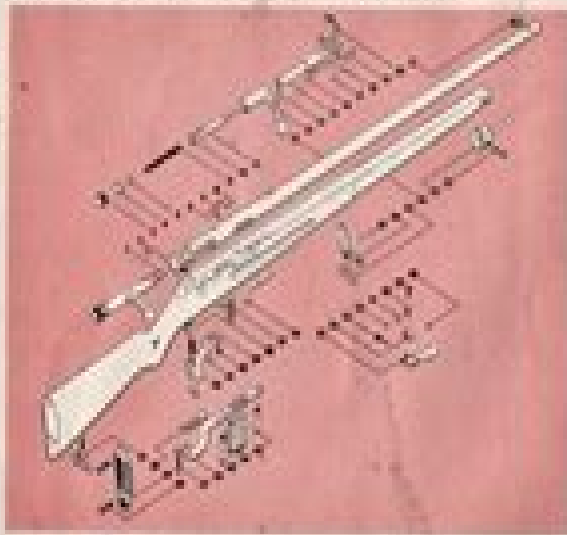

In 1933, this rifle was replaced by the Savage Model 19-22 target rifle, featuring a sport stock, self-propagated ball stock and other improvements.
