

Production of Supernumerary PGCs during Embryonic Development

The diagram illustrates the production of supernumerary PGCs during embryonic development. The process begins with a zygote, which undergoes cleavage to form a morula. The morula then develops into a blastocyst, where the inner cell mass (ICM) and outer cell mass (OCM) are visible. The ICM gives rise to the embryo, while the OCM gives rise to the placenta. The diagram shows that supernumerary PGCs are produced from the OCM and can be used for various purposes, including research and clinical applications.
