Abstract

The goal of the Cyclone project is to investigate how to make a low-level C-like language safe. Our most difficult challenge has been providing programmers control over memory management while retaining safety. This paper¹ describes our experience trying to integrate and use effectively two previously-proposed, safe memory-management mechanisms: statically-scoped regions and tracked pointers. We found that these typing mechanisms can be combined to build alternative memory-management abstractions, such as reference counted objects and arenas with dynamic lifetimes, and thus provide a flexible basis. Our experience—porting C programs and device drivers, and building new applications for resource-constrained systems—confirms that experts can use these features to improve memory footprint and sometimes to improve throughput when used instead of, or in combination with, conservative garbage collection.

1 Introduction

Low-level languages such as C provide a degree of control over space, time, and predictability that high-level languages such as Java do not. But the lack of safety for C has led to many failures and security problems. The goal of our research is try to bring the “Mohammad of safety” to the “mountain of existing C code.”

¹ This work is based on an earlier work [1]: Experience with safe manual memory-management in cyclone, in ISMM '04: Proceedings of the 4th international symposium on Memory management, (c) ACM, 2004. <http://doi.acm.org/10.1145/1029873.1029883> This paper improves on the framework presented in the conference version by strictly separating pointer tracking and regions; this permits unique or reference-counted pointers to any region, and enables supporting reaps, which we discuss in some detail. The exposition has been generally revised and improved. All experimental results reported in [1] have been revised to use the new framework, and we additionally present experience with porting three Linux device drivers and one scientific application to Cyclone.
