

- Uses star topology and defines how child hub can be connected to a parent hub to extend the network.

100BaseT? (Fast Ethernet)

- Uses CSMA/CD on a star-wired bus.
- There are 3 specifications:
 - 100BaseT4: Uses pair category 3, 4 or 5 UTP.
 - 100BaseTX: Uses 2-pair category 5 UTP or STP.
 - 100BaseFX: Uses 2-strand fiber-optic

Token Ring Network Architecture

- IEEE 802.5 specification.
- Star wired ring topology (logical ring)
- Uses token passing access method.
- Can have higher transmission speeds than Ethernet
- It has larger frames than Ethernet => more can get transferred over the wire in any given time.
- Uses IBM STP Types 1, 2 and 3 cabling. (Can be UTP)
- Transmits at 4 and 16 Mbps. (16 Mbps cards will slow down to 4 Mbps if put on that kind of network, but the 4 Mbps cards can't speed up.
- Baseband transmission
- Data travels in one direction only
- Each computer acts as a unidirectional repeater
- Deterministic method of cable access. Computers cannot use the cable unless they have the token. Therefore, computers can't force their way onto the network like CSMA/CD (Ethernet)
- First computer online is assigned to monitor network activity.

Token Ring Components

- Multistation Access Units (MSAU's)
- Smart Multistation Access Units (SMAU's)
- Computers attach directly to the MSAU in a physical star to form a logical ring.
- Each MSAU has 10 connection ports ==> can support 8 clients with 2 ports for ring in and ring out.
- Each ring can have as many as 33 MSAU's
- Up to 12 MSAU's can connect to each other
- The MSAU can sense if a computer is down and then disconnect it from the ring => built-in fault tolerance
- Most token ring systems use IBM type 3 cabling.
- Token ring networks are well suited to fiber optic cable: data travels in only one direction in it.
