Why is diagnosis and treatment for post traumatic stress disorder more common in women than it is for men? Examining the statistics behind potentially traumatic events (PTEs) are found to be higher in men which ultimately would be expected to have results in a more probable chance of getting PTSD. Except on the contrary women are actually experiencing a higher amount of certain kinds of PTEs that in effect cause a bigger emotionally vulnerable state. (Tolin, Foa, 2006) The gender differences in women's cognitive response to traumatic experiences is far more recognizable to diagnose due to their increased comprehensible symptoms to detect. On the contrary men's emotional responses to even the same traumatic event is found to be less identifiable. "Males showed higher skin conductance response in instrumental conditioning fear paradigm and slower habituation for negative acoustic stimuli but were not as reactive as females in skin conductance response to experimental stimuli," wrote Ju and Jingchu. This experiment conducted shows how the physical replication of an extremely traumatic event triggers the operant system that has been trained in their brain as it responds to this stimulant. Even though the male's physical responses are the most prominent for their gender it is still lesser than the women's physical reactions. Showing that even in the brains psychological programming women are just higher in chance to likely have those more extreme symptoms showing, making the entire diagnosis process much simpler versus how it is in the opposite gender.

The potentially traumatic events that men and boys are facing are typically the same, just with slight variations from the ones that women and girls experience. Men and boys most common PTEs were found to be "accidents, nonsexual assault, combat or war, disaster or fire, witnessing death or injury, and serious illness or unspecified injury." (David, Edna, 2006) These life events are not tied strictly to one specific gender. Although those listed are more prominent in men, 91% of women and girls tragically have experienced sexual assault or child sexual abuse. Based solely on the fact the high
