

10 EASY WAYS TO FIX

PORTABLE RADIOS

By Homer L. Davidson

Because most portable radios are rather inexpensive to begin with, most radio-TV repair shops won't tackle them today. But you don't have to toss that non-working set in the trash can. Most of the time you can get it back in good operating condition yourself, just by following these ten easy repair tips.

What You Need

You'll need a meter to make these ten common repairs on most portable radios. You should have either a voltohmmeter (VOM), or the more modern DMM, a digital multimeter. Using one of these meters you'll be able to find leaky or open diodes and power supply rectifiers, bad transistors, or open speakers and transformer windings.

Before you do anything else, visually inspect the radio with the case removed. A broken dial cord or a snapped antenna is easy to spot, but lots of other problems can also be located, if you look carefully.

Bad Sound

If the sound is raspy or scratchy, it may be due to a speaker with a hole or tear in its paper cone. Or the cone may be loose. You may have to remove the speaker to check this by removing the two or four screws holding it to the case. Dirty volume controls can also be detected by sound. The rest of the ten most common problems can be found using the VOM or DMM.

Burned Diodes

Most radio problems are found in the audio output on the power supply circuits. Check the batteries and terminals if the radio is dead in battery operation. If the radio is dead in the ac operation, inspect the on/off switch and the silicon rectifiers. A burned diode can be seen easily (Fig. 1). Remove one end of each diode and take an accurate resistance measurement, if no burn marks can be seen.

A leaky diode will have a low resistance measurement in both directions. Replace the diode if you find low resistance (below 350 ohms). Now reverse the test leads and take another measurement. Install a new silicon diode if you have a low reading. A normal diode should show low ohms measurement in one direction, and infinite measurement with reversed test leads.

Figure 1. If there's no sound (and the speaker is OK) a good bet is burned or leaky silicon rectifier diodes in the power supply. Check with a flashlight if necessary. Replace with a one amp, two, or 2.5 amp rectifier.
