Psychological distress and health status are important outcomes of interest in the study of the impact of the environment on health. The purpose of this study was to examine the relationship between physical activity and psychological distress and health status in a sample of older adults. The study was a cross-sectional design. Data were collected from a national survey of older adults. The sample consisted of 1,000 older adults (65 years and older) who were living in the United States. The study was conducted in 2000. The data were analyzed using logistic regression. The results of the study showed that physical activity was significantly associated with psychological distress and health status. The study also found that the relationship between physical activity and psychological distress and health status was mediated by social support. The study has several limitations. First, the study was a cross-sectional design, so it cannot establish causality. Second, the study used self-reported data, which may be subject to bias. Third, the study did not control for all potential confounding factors. Despite these limitations, the study provides valuable information about the relationship between physical activity and psychological distress and health status in older adults.
