Transformation of Women's Rights under section 6 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956

The United Nation's Report in 1980 displayed that -"Women constitute a large portion of the world's populace, work for about 66% of its time and only get one tenth of the world's pay and under one hundredth of the property." The Hindu woman's position is not very different. Despite the fact that a woman in a Hindu family relished a respectable status regarding upbringing in the family, she was a disregarded individual with reference to property holdings. A lot like those of women of some other nations, the property privileges of Hindu women have developed out of an on-going struggle between the general population supporting the old norms and the persons pushing the dynamic corrections. There is no single body of property privileges of Hindu women. Their property rights get decided relying upon which religion and religious school she takes after, whether she is married or not, which part of the nation she originates from, whether she is tribal or non-tribal, and so on and so forth.

Earlier, women were entitled to hold only two kinds of property, namely "stridhana" and "women's estate", but the share of property held by her was always a lot lesser than that held by a Hindu male. Stridhana was the total property of a Hindu woman over which she had full powers to alienate, sell, gift, mortgage or lease throughout her life, but certain restrictions were imposed on her power, if she was married. On her death, all types of stridhana passed on to her own heirs. The property of which a Hindu woman was a limited owner comprised her limited estate or women's estate or widow's estate. The Hindu female owner had limited power of disposal. She couldn't ordinarily alienate the corpus except for legal necessity, benefit of estate and for religious duties. On her death, her estate devolved upon the heir of the last full owner known as "reversionary", who could be either a male or a female. Hence, since time immemorial the laws have been made solely for the advantage or benefit of man, and woman has been dealt with as menial, and subject to male support.

A few institutions were made in the pre-independence India overseeing the Hindu woman's entitlement to property. In any case, the position of women did not progress. After the failure
