

Cloning

Cloning in Pop Culture:

There are many movies out there having to do with the idea of having clones of someone or something. In movies, it usually is always with the case of humans. Here are some examples of some movies and shows that have cloning involved in them.

The one that is the least likely to happen is the one in Dexter's Lab. In Dexter's lab, the characters speak of a "cloning machine" like it's a copying machine. Cloning just doesn't work that way.

What is cloning?

In Nature:

In nature, cloning is the process of producing populations of genetically-identical individuals. The organisms that are involved in "cloning" are usually the ones involved in asexual reproduction, such as bacteria, plants, and insects.

In Biotechnology:

In biotechnology, cloning is the process used to create artificial copies of DNA fragments, cells, or organisms. Usually this is done by taking out the chromosomes in an egg cell by removing the nucleus and replacing them with ones extracted from an adult organism. The egg is then implanted in the womb of an animal – usually one closest in species to the original organism, and left to develop into first an embryo, and then into a living organism.

Two Different Types of Cloning:

There are two different types of cloning: therapeutic and reproductive. Reproductive cloning involves creating an organism in order to make a copy of it – it's the one we most commonly know. Therapeutic cloning is used for many things including stem cell research, research into human development, and gene therapies.

While both uses the same methods of development, the differences are that reproductive cloning is when the scientists allow the embryo to grow into a living organism, such as an animal, while therapeutic cloning is when the somatic cell is allowed to grow for approximately two weeks and then cells that were grown inside, usually a human tissue or stem cells, would be extracted. These things that are "grown" are usually stem cells, human tissue, or even whole organs that are used as a replacement organ during transplants in humans.

Human Cloning:

In present day, human cloning is NOT possible in most areas of the world. The reason for this is currently, any biological experimentation on humans is illegal in most of the world (including drug tests) UNLESS humans volunteer for them. The debate arose only after the famous Dolly the Sheep, the first animal clone, was produced in 1996 when the idea that if people could clone a sheep, they could clone humans started to develop. Several reasons for why this is illegal are because of the religious and ethical controversies surrounding this issue. Not only that but seeing as 1 or 2 out of 100 attempts at cloning were successful and because we also have a lack of understanding regarding human reproductive cloning, it would be unethical to try.

Even if the cloning were to be successful, scientists aren't sure of the impact it would have on the human clone's mind. As mood and intellect aren't as important to mice and cows, for a healthy human, these are very important.
