ABSTRACT

This paper is a partial fulfillment of the dissertation undertaken with the case study of teaching writing recounts for the EFL Thai upper secondary school students with SFL genre-based approach at Hunkhapittayakorn Secondary School, Hunkha District, Chaiyathum Province, Thailand, the second semester of the academic year 2015. This study focused on the analysis of students' generic structure development of recount writing texts through SFL perspective. Teaching of personal experience recount genre using the teaching-learning cycle of the SFL genre-based approach was employed to 26 Matayom Suksa five students. The analysis of the students' pretest writing texts showed that they could not control the structures of their texts in that these writing texts were non-conformed to the stages of recount writing, and the themes were sidetracked from the topic. However, when these students were exposed writing with the SFL genre-based approach, the analysis demonstrated that their personal experience recounts were positively developed with a higher degree of generic structure construction in terms of conformity when compared to the modeling texts of the literature review and the pretest texts at the commencement of the course. It was observable that all students could expand communicative details and dialogic expansion in their final personal experience recount texts from such the orientation stage, the series of the events and the re-orientation stage with some CODA, argumentative elaboration. This is argued that SFL genre-based approach helps promote the students' understanding and writing ability about the meaning, purpose and organization of the personal experience recount texts insofar that they could independently execute the similar texts themselves in a more degree. The study suggested that the SFL genre-based approach should be promoted continuously to develop writing skill of secondary school students in all levels of education related or in other similar contexts.

INTRODUCTION

Introduction and Problems

A literature review (Feez, 2002; Derewianka, 2003; Halliday & Matthiessen, 2004; Foley, 2005; LUU, 2011; Srirong, 2011) revealed that most studies addressed either particularly teaching writing or accurately using academic language to the EFL students in the tertiary educational level. Writing skill was the most difficult skill to teach Thai EFL students and mobilized educational institutes to engage with amendment of the students' academic literacy skills (Chiemawong, 2001; Syananondh & Padgate, 2005; Padgate, 2008).

Theoretically, there are many approaches and methods for teaching English writing and genre-based approach is one of the fruitful ideologies which has gained attention from educators and researchers around the world (Callaghan & Rothery, 1993; Martin, 1993; Halliday, 1994; Paltridge, 2001; Christie & Unsworth, 2006; Gibbon, 2007; Christie & Derewianka, 2008; Thompson, 2014). In this regard, Johns (2002) has implemented SFL genre-based approach with attempting to validate standard structures of the text and stages of rhetorical moves focusing on the varieties of grammatical features, to teach writing in K12 and at adult-learner levels. LUU (2011) employed six-staged language course with forty-five first year students of Finance-Marketing from Ho Chi Minh City University in Viet Nam to investigate the impacts of conducting reading skills to the students' learning. In Thailand, Srirong (2011) investigated that the generic structure development on writing 'exposition' and 'discussion' where it was found that apart from the prototype texts, some students constructed their texts in the form of the middle way of giving arguments which was an effect from the Thai culture through SFL genre-based approach with Thai university students.

As abovementioned, it is found that a few studies applied the SFL genre-based pedagogy to develop writing skill in the context of EFL Thai upper secondary school students, and most studies reinforced the needs to accelerate the devel-
