By: Rose Lewis | SEPTEMBER 2020

INTRODUCTION

Many fathers, including those who participate in fatherhood programs, have experienced trauma that may be affecting negative efforts on how they think, feel, behave, and relate to themselves and others. This can impact involvement in roles including parenting, school, their relationships with their children and/or parent, and their personal and community life.¹

The benefits of using trauma-informed (TI) research in programs that serve fathers have been well documented.² But the quality of the research about fatherhood programs and the experiences of study participants can also be improved by incorporating TI knowledge and principles into the research design.³ A TI approach to fatherhood research, from conceptualization to dissemination, ensures that anyone involved in the process (including study participants, program staff members, researchers, and others) may have experienced trauma and provides that practitioners continue to avoid causing additional trauma to everyone involved. By grounding their work in culturally-responsive TI approach, researchers can develop a deeper understanding of the participants' experiences, participants, and needs of fathers.⁴

This brief outlines ways to apply critical TI knowledge to research involving fathers and fatherhood programs and looks at the benefits for research-participant interactions throughout the research process.
