Resources in Education ,2000-10 How Important is Selection? David J. McKenzie,John Gibson,Steven Stillman,2006
Measuring the gain in income from migration is complicated by non random selection of migrants from the general population making it difficult to obtain an appropriate comparison group of non migrants This paper uses a migrant lottery to overcome this problem providing an experimental measure of the income gains from migration New Zealand allows a quota of Tongans to immigrate each year with a lottery to choose among the excess number of applicants A unique survey conducted by the authors in these two countries allows experimental estimates of the income gains from migration by comparing the incomes of migrants to those who applied to migrate but whose names were not drawn in the lottery after allowing for the effect of non compliance among some of those whose names were drawn The authors also conducted a survey of individuals who did not apply for the lottery Comparing this non applicant group with the migrants enables assessment of the degree to which non experimental methods can provide an unbiased estimate of the income gains from migration They find evidence of migrants being positively selected in terms of both observed and unobserved skills As a result non experimental methods are found to overstate the gains from migration by 9 to 82 percent A good instrumental variable works best while difference in differences and bias adjusted propensity score matching also perform comparatively well World Bank web site Global Symposium on Gender and Fisheries P.
