Public Policy is the subfield of Political Science concerned with examining the causes and consequences of governmental decisions. Historically, but not for sound epistemological reasons, "policy sciences," "policy studies," and "policy analysis" also refer to the intellectual activity of understanding how government works and what difference it makes. Because "public policy," in ordinary language, refers to the outputs of the policy-making process, I tend to prefer "policy analysis" to refer to the study of the policy-making process and substantive policy issues.

Policy analysis is the creation, distribution, and utilization of knowledge for and about the public policy-making process. Policy analysis, along with being a subfield of traditional political science, is a multidisciplinary field that involves the disciplines of economics, sociology, psychology, public administration, social work, law, agricultural sciences, etc. in understanding the policy process and in providing knowledge for decision-makers. Policy analysis requires sound preparation in analytical methods, the politics of the policy process, and the complexities of a substantive policy area.

The objectives of this seminar are:

1. To increase your knowledge of the American policy-making process;
2. To introduce you to the questions and controversies surrounding the field of policy analysis;
3. To relate policy analysis to traditional academic disciplines and to the policy-making process;
4. To examine the extent to which policy analysis is used in the policy process;
5. To examine the characteristics of "useful" policy research;
6. To consider briefly several current policy issues as examples of questions and challenges posed to policy analysts;
7. To introduce you to the economic approach to policy analysis; and
8. To introduce you to an approach assessing the performance of the American policy-making process.

This seminar provides an opportunity to polish your professional analytical, writing, and communication skills. If successful, this seminar will pose meaningful questions that you will consider as you go about your graduate education and undertake policy analysis.
