

Changing the social norms of death and dying

Question:

We spend a lot of time in this course discussing the ways in which modern Western societies tend to avoid thinking about, talking about, and dealing with death. Your paper would focus on specific ways to change these social norms, including ways to destigmatize or normalize conversations around death (e.g., educational interventions, death dinners), interventions to encourage people to create advanced medical directives and to consider organ donation. I also want your paper to discuss how we, as a society, can better support grieving people, so that they don't feel so isolated in the aftermath of a loss. This might be a discussion of grief and bereavement groups, but also broader societal changes to build up social capital and reduce social isolation.

Changing Social Norms Around the Concept of Death

Our Modern Society and Death

The bitter truth to life is that death is a chapter that is inevitable, yet still a taboo topic in our modern society. Think about how much you would have planned your wedding, having children down the line, or how much thought has gone into planning the good aspects of our life. It is unfortunate to think that more than anything else we can plan for our future, death is the one thing that is certain, yet is something we as a society avoid conversating of the most. Of course, speaking on a topic that is frowned on due to the grief and sadness it brings can be hard, but we all know that its coming, so why do we never speak on it?

Social norms surrounding this taboo topic have caused us to become a "death denying society". (Corr, 2014). Due to death being an individualistic experience, we as a society have strayed away from speaking to someone going through this experience and encourage reassurance and distance. In a way, though it is an individualistic experience, people who hold close relationships to the individual would experience the aftermath of feelings. Even the media has been known to glorify unrealistic deaths, specifically for children. "Cartoons like the celebrated Road Runner series in which the villain, Wile E. Coyote, is repeatedly "killed," but almost immediately resurrected to rejoin the chase and other adventures in life" (Corr, 2014). This is one of many examples of how exactly death is portrayed in our society, especially to the developing minds of children.
