ARIE W. KRUGLANSKI, MARINA CHERNIKOVA, and CATALINA KOPETZ

Abstract

Traditionally, research on the psychology of motivation has addressed two separate questions: the What of motivation and the How of motivation. The former concerns the nature of the various motives that propel human behavior, and the latter the general process whereby any motive exerts its effects. This essay reviews historical and contemporary research in each of the foregoing categories. We highlight cutting edge concepts and findings in motivation science and identify emerging trends and future challenges.

INTRODUCTION

Following a relative lull during the 1970s and 1980s (Higgins, 2012) research on motivation appears once again to be commanding attention from psychological researchers. Traditionally, the topic of motivation has been a mainstay of the science of psychology. It has played a major role in early dynamic models of the mind (including psychoanalytic theory), and it was fundamental to behaviorist theories of learning and action. The advent of the cognitive revolution in the 1960s and 1970s largely eclipsed the emphasis on motivation, but in the past two decades, motivational research has been making a forceful comeback. These days, motivational analyses of affect, cognition, and behavior are ubiquitous across various psychological literatures. Motivational research not only has conceptual implications for understanding mind and behavior, but also has direct and pragmatic implications for daily self-regulation, addiction, substance abuse, mental health, life at home and the workplace, consumer behavior, and other areas of application as well. Motivation is not just a “passing fancy” on the contemporary scene; rather, it is firmly entrenched as a foundational issue in scientific psychology.

THE WHAT AND THE HOW OF MOTIVATION

Generally speaking, motivational research in psychology has been of two general kinds, addressing what one might call the What and the How of
