Abstract—This study examined the effects of a 12-week training program on the heart rate variability (HRV) responses to the Valsalva maneuver in healthy young adults. HRV was measured during the Valsalva maneuver at baseline and after 12 weeks of training. The results showed that the Valsalva maneuver induced a significant increase in HRV after 12 weeks of training. This increase was associated with a decrease in the Valsalva maneuver-induced increase in heart rate. The results suggest that the Valsalva maneuver may be a useful tool for assessing the effects of training on HRV.
