

The trial of Tim Robinson, a black who is falsely implicated in the raping of white woman, Mayella, is the key event of the book. It not only exposes the bigotry of white society but also shows how the powerful lobby of white is used to maintain deliberate racial divide within the society. Throughout the trial, both the children sit in the 'colored' balcony with their housekeeper and become witness to the injustice that is meted out to the innocent Robinson by the white jurists who declare him to be the convict. Mayella is victim of circumstances who is forced to lay the blame on Tim. Tim Robinson is shot when he tries to flee. The whole episode significantly influences children. They are forced to acknowledge that evil things exist but it can be fought. Jem, the elder brother of Scout explains the odd behavior of Boo Radley behaves by telling Scout that 'if there's just one kind of folks, why can't they get along with each other? ... I think I'm beginning to understand why Boo Radley's stayed... It's because he wants to stay inside' (p240).

Children like Dill and Boo lend credence to the inherent curiosity and goodness within the children. As children, while they can enjoy the childhood curiosities, they have also the ability to stand up and fight against the bad elements of the society and social norms. When Boo kills evil Ewell, Sheriff Tate tells Scout that Ewell fell over his own knife. Scout replies, 'Yes sir, I understand... 'Mr. Tate was right.' ... Well, it'd be sort of like shootin' a mockingbird, wouldn't it?' (p 276). Indeed, the book has tackled the issue of racism with high sensitivity and shown that children's nurturing environment can greatly facilitate dynamics of social changes.
