Abstract—A 2000 survey of 1000 U.S. adults found that 10% of respondents had been sexually abused in childhood. The prevalence of sexual abuse was higher among females than males, and among those with lower education and income. The study also found that victims of sexual abuse were more likely to experience mental health problems, substance abuse, and difficulties in relationships and work. These findings highlight the need for continued research and support for victims of childhood sexual abuse.
