Introduction

Learning, which is defined as the process of human beings gaining knowledge and expertise is an important aspect of man's life and continues throughout his existence. Learning theories propose mechanisms that account for the changes that occur as a result of our learning experiences.

Learning theories have resulted in the identification of mechanisms through which experiences in the environment would alter and sustain changes in behavior. These changes are of a relatively permanent nature, and Newman and Philip (2007) affirm that the changes in human behavior are as a result of human beings' extensive capacity for learning.

Classical conditioning is one of the most popular learning theories developed in the late 1920s. This theory has been reviewed and applied in many areas and has helped in understanding learning. This paper will give a brief description of the theory of classical conditioning and how it works. A scenario whereby this theory could be applied in real life situations will be given and a detailed description of how one would implement classical conditioning demonstrated.

Describe the theory of classical conditioning

The Russian Scientist, Ivan Pavlov, is hugely credited for coming up with the classical conditioning theory and demonstrating its working. Pavlov's experimental works led him to discover classical conditioning and its laws which he demonstrated using his famous Pavlov's dog experiment. By definition, classical conditioning is the "pairing of an unconditioned stimulus with a conditioned stimulus to produce a conditioned response" (Levin, 1995, p.175).

In classical conditioning, there is already a preexisting bond between the stimulus and some physiological response in the learner. Classical conditioning has since its formulation been overlooked as being fairly simple and easy to understand and only
