Figure 3.5.6 shows one of many. For this reason, it is not possible for us to design a good one. There are, however, algorithms that overcome the space problem without sacrificing optimality or completeness. It is called recursive best-first search. We discuss this next.

3.5.2 Recursive best-first heuristic search

The simplest way to reduce memory requirements for A^* is to allow the idea of heuristic weighting in the heuristic search process, resulting in the heuristic weighting A^* (HB A^) algorithm. The main difference between HB A^ and standard heuristic weighting is that the cost function is $f(n) = g(n) + h(n)$ rather than the slight, somewhat arbitrary, $g(n) + h(n)$ value in the usual A^* cost of any node that exceeded the cost of the previous frontier. HB A^* is applied to the same problem with only one cost, and avoids the additional overhead associated with keeping a table of g values. Unfortunately, it suffers from the same difficulties with respect to when the frontier consists of nodes that are already explored (Figure 3.5.7). The space-bound version of other heuristic search algorithms, called RBFS and RBF A^* ,

Recursive best-first search (RBFS) is a simple heuristic algorithm that attempts to solve the problem of searching for the search tree using only those space. The algorithm is shown in Figure 3.5.8. Its operation is similar to that of a recursive depth-first search. The difference is that, instead of always going to the next node, it goes to the current node's best child. If the current node exceeds the limit, the recursive search back to the alternative path. In the recursive version, RBFS explores the frontier of nodes using the path with the lowest f -value. In fact, it can be shown that the f -value of the best node in the frontier is the f -value of the optimal solution and can therefore decide whether or not
