This can impact involvement and roles including how they spend their relationships with their children and/or parent, including potential vulnerability to violence.

The benefits of using trauma-informed (TI) research in programs that serve fathers have been well documented^{1,2} and the quality of the research about fatherhood programs and the experiences of study participants can also be improved by incorporating TI knowledge and principles into the research design.^{3,4} A TI approach to fatherhood research, from conceptualization to dissemination, ensures that anyone involved in the process (including study participants, program staff members, researchers, and others) may have experienced trauma and ensures that procedures are taken to avoid causing additional trauma to anyone involved. By grounding their work in culturally-responsive TI approach, researchers can develop a deeper understanding of the participants, programs, participants, and results of fathers.⁵

This brief outlines ways to apply trauma TI knowledge to research involving fathers and fatherhood programs and looks at the benefits for research-participant interactions throughout the research process.
