SELECTED EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH PAPERS

ABSTRACT:

Reviewing and critically analyzing the works of others is a rewarding process in terms of one's own learning and development as highlighted by Wood & Kurzel (2008). Those who engage in such an analysis and reflective process gain more opportunities for developing their evaluative and critical abilities (Sluijsmans, Dochy, & Moerkerke, 1998). Identifying the good and bad approaches adopted by other others in their works help reviewers in their own works (Ballantyne, Hughes, & Mylonas, 2002), as through this process they acquire a deeper understanding of the writing standards (Hanrahan & Isaacs, 2001) and development of a life-long learning ability (Boase - Jelinek, Parker, & Herrington, 2014). Professor Simon Peyton Jones, a renowned researcher at Microsoft and Glasgow University, also identified the process of writing as a learning activity in itself that pushes the writers to be clearer, more focused and being more aware of what they do not understand.

With this aim, analysis and review of the methodology of two purposively selected journal articles related to pedagogy in higher education is undertaken in this paper. The scope of this review covers an examination of the research problem (identification, appropriateness, and explanation), literature review, theoretical underpinnings, methodology, research design and settings, methods and instruments, ethical considerations, data analysis, identification of potential limitations, conclusions, generalizations and reporting.

The lessons learnt through this research review study will be beneficial for reviewers and young researchers in improving the quality of their own research.

INTRODUCTION

For this analysis, the following two papers have been purposively selected based on their appropriateness for current research and relevant pragmatic considerations. The articles have been de-identified in accordance with the ethical requirements for current study (as the objective is to present critique of research techniques only):

1. Article 1 deals with integration of teaching and research in a first year food and nutrition course. It was published in a recognized educational research journal (included in the ERA list of journals, 2015) in the year 2012.

Research on University Teaching and Faculty Development Olga María Alegre de la Rosa,Luis Miguel Villar Angulo,2015
This book builds on the tradition of concern for university innovation that has characterized higher education throughout the world It recognizes the university needs for continuous development of students and faculty It involves recommendations applicable to classroom teaching thus providing a bridge between research and practice It helps readers meet some university challenges and build effective universities for present times For all those reasons we believe that this book is right
The need for renewed focus on innovation in higher education stems from several sources First some social and educational agencies are expressing dissatisfaction with the performance of the general higher education system Although we do not agree with the criticism many universities around the world assume their responsibility for launching research projects and programs for promoting quality in teaching and learning within their faculty and community Second the world in which universities operate is changing noticeably Colleges and universities are experiencing basic changes in student admission and placement In the nearest future the student body will be over 25 years of age Students will need methodologies to access learning materials and participate in online actions and communications over the Internet at their own convenience The third reason for a special attention on university innovations comprises market competition in society Students are annually evaluating the value of any university degree based upon their perceptions on quality in flexible teaching resources and new educational technologies campus and classroom learning environments services and fees Students are demanding more than a piece of paper as a premium placed on a college degree They envisage universities must provide the major guide and best way for finding jobs and career progress Fourth colleges and universities are encouraging the development of long distance education and massive open online courses Government agencies foster competition among institutions in order to provide powerful mental tools to help students to master tough subjects Besides private higher education institutions are emerging and competing for students with those of the public sector Finally some books outline improvement processes needed by faculty members to undertake curriculum and teaching innovations However very few claim to describe the teaching competencies needed by university faculty who work in higher education classroom settings Furthermore universities offering innovation programs and courses use those competencies to identify learning change and teacher and student progress toward curriculum development
